

Ladies and Gentlemen,

Krakow is a unique place. It combines history and the present time, the former capital, the seat of kings, the city of priceless historical monuments, the cultural and artistic heart of Poland, the active and versatile academic and scientific centre. It is also a modern, fast developing city, attracting investors and new technologies.

I am glad that Krakow will host the International GeeCON Conference in May 2011 with its eminent participants – academics, highly skilled information technology specialists and world renowned experts.

I cordially invite you to Krakow. I am convinced that the conference will provide the opportunity for exchange of experience and knowledge and establishing new contacts, making the days spent in our city a most fruitful period. I believe that in the breaks between the effective, scientific discussions you will find some time to take a stroll and see the abundance of historical monuments and treasures in our magical city.

Yours faithfully,
